Those men have been vanquished, but they have not ceased to be men. They think and feel and reason still. They did not part with their manhood when they surrendered their swords. They did not lay down their honor when they laid down their arms. They cherish with fond regret the memories of those who fell fighting by their sides, and indulge a pride in their own achievements upon the field, and in the fame of the Generals who led them in battle. It would be unreasonable, unnatural and unphilosophical to suppose or expect a contrary feeling. Are such views and feelings inconsistent with fature usefulness and loyalty to the government? There seems to be a systematic effort on the part of certain men to convince the Government that the people of the South are still refractory and rebellious. We do not believe it—and we appeal to those who are so industriously engaged in promalgating this idea, to pause and satisfy themselves of the truth before they give currency to reports calculated and the property of the state. The present is, therefore, a favorable time for parties to order such papers as will keep them posted in regard to the great events which are transpiring.
